SchmartBoard Is Looking for Beta Testers
New Website will be Social Network for Electronics Enthusiasts

Fremont, CA – May 7 2008 – SchmartBoard announced today that they are looking for people to beta test a soon to be opened web space call Solder By Numbers™.

The website, which is due to launch in late summer will be a social network for electronics enthusiasts. SchmartBoard is looking for all levels of testers from professional engineers to novices who have an interest in electronics. They are looking for people from around the world.

According to SchmartBoard's VP of sales & marketing Neal Greenberg, "SchmartBoard is not yet ready to reveal specific details about the website, except that it is web 2.0 for electronics enthusiasts. Solderbynumbers.com will be a place to design and build your electronic circuits while you create a worldwide network of peers. The site will be much more than a social network. It will be a place to collaborate, create, communicate and learn."

To sign up to be a beta-tester, go to www.solderbynumbers.com

About SchmartBoard (www.schmartboard.com)

SchmartBoard™ is committed to helping engineers, students and hobbyists develop electronic circuits faster, easier, and less expensively than previously possible.
